COMMAND SCHOOL ADDRESSES THE NEED FOR ACTIVE DEFENSE IN ALL CORPORATE SECURITY PLANS - New Three-Day Seminar For Corporate Security Managers Launched.

Command School bridges that final most crucial gap in corporate security which is the ability to mount an active defense to eliminate lethal threats at their inception.

Chicago, IL, September 3, 2019: Distributed Security, Inc. (DSI) announced today the launch of Command School, a three-day seminar designed for private enterprise CEOs and senior security managers who are concerned about the defense of their enterprise from violent threat. The thirty-hour Command School seminar instructs participants on:

1. How to assess your enterprise vulnerability and establish an active defense.
2. How to recruit, train, and operate a private security force capable of mounting an active defense.
3. How to build-out a distributed security network capable of defending your immediate community.

Mike Smock CEO and co-presenter of the Command School seminar said:

“In the recent past, corporate security managers did not have to worry about lethal threats to enterprise employees. Active shooters and terrorists were basically unheard of during the twentieth century,. But, with a dramatic increase in active shooters, workplace violence, and an unforeseen mainstreaming of socialistic looting of private enterprise, historical data is no longer a reliable indicator of future events.”

An active defense is the ability to mount an effective, rapid response, eliminating lethal threats at point of inception. By ignoring this foundational security requirement, enterprises fail to protect their most valuable asset; their employees

Command School bridges that final, most crucial gap in corporate security, and teaches corporate security managers and CEOs how to plan, prepare, train, and mount an active defense. Included in the cost of the $3,995 seminar are:
